L. Summary of my Activities and Future Plans

The onset of my academic research was focused around the issues of warfare conditions, national security emergencies, rule of law and problems connected with social and political order. Hence the first several of my publications were around issues of political and socio-legal order. I have gradually desired to unveil more about politics and law, i.e., the political mechanisms of the legal field and the legal mechanisms of the political field in various contexts. On the one hand, it was natural for me to explore these issues due to my joint Ph.d/Jd academic education and continuous training in law, social sciences and the humanities.

On the other hand it was clear to me that issues of legal and sociopolitical order are significantly affected by the place of law in politics and the place of politics in law. Hence my publications have unveiled the sociopolitical and cultural sources of judicial review and of legitimacy of supreme courts. While the literature has mainly focused on institutional judicial legitimacy I have mainly explicated the mythical sources of judicial legitimacy and how they have interacted with other types of judicial legitimacy. My research was pioneering in explicating how sociopolitical myths are shaping judicial legitimacy in addition to and relative to diffuse and specific sources of judicial legitimacy.

In the late 1990s I realized through conferences and debates with colleagues that non-judicial legal institutions are important to our public life and yet have been neglected in research. Accordingly I have published a series of studies regarding governmental lawyers, the attorney general and the state comptroller in comparative law and comparative politics and in Israel. This type of research has responded to and solved important gaps and discrepancies in our understanding of law in public life. Understanding of law and politics cannot be done without the sociopolitical and legal analysis of state political power, legal consciousness, social mobilization, and cultures around human rights. Thus, since the late 1990s I have published extensively on communities and law while taking into account the context of multiculturalism, liberalism and globalization. My studies have originally explicated how non-ruling communities, i.e., minorities, may use or misuse state law and communal law for their political strategies and struggles for social justice and equality. My studies have also elaborated an original theoretical approach on why and how to construct group rights in democracies alongside liberalism in ways that empower non-ruling communities as agents for legal reforms, social justice and equality. My research interest in understanding communities and human rights through interactions with the nation-state has resulted inter alia in research of religion in modernity and law. Religion is deeply embedded in modernity and my research has genuinely contributed to better understanding the legal and sociopolitical boundaries between religious communities, especially non liberal, and the nation-state amid neo-liberal globalization.

The dilemma about the effects of globalization on state law and on the interactions between state and communities has been another pillar in my research that points that despite more facets of modern globalization state law is still meaningfully constructing our life. My research examines what does it mean for human rights and social change. Thus I have demonstrated that there is still a significant absence of international language of human rights while state law is a limited agent of a social change. The liberal project may offer only a partial response to these predicaments. Thus, my research about lawyers in the public sphere argues that lawyers incline to be salient regarding abuse of human rights. My study allows us to much better comprehend the reasons why litigation is a relatively limited type of a collective action and why its added value to social changes is problematic. In this context of my interest in law and social change my studies have looked into lawyers both as economic entrepreneurs and as political agents in various contexts.

Briefly stating - my research on politics of law and law of politics varies from epistemology of asking questions about law, politics and society, through explicating theoretically and empirically state law and communal law and sociopolitical and constitutional struggles among and between them. My research has been comparative on the one hand and applied to better comprehension of law, politics and society in Israel, on the other hand. My explorations of law, politics, and society have included variety of issues from national security and public policy, to political corruption, the rule of law, state institutions, legal consciousness and legal cultures, supreme courts, legal institutions, litigation and other types of collective action, social transformations, religion, social changes, political parties, minorities, and communities.

My current book under work is a project designed to theoretically and empirically answer a classic and yet a crucial and modern dilemma: why and how law could have been a component in political power and yet also a somewhat effective mechanism to partially taming politics. The book project covers about ten various analytical dimensions from courts to international organizations and will suggest a new theoretical view on how to understand the place of law in political power.

As in my teaching so is in my research I am referring to my diverse training in different methodologies and put it into use in my studies that have been characterized by diversity of methodologies drilling into law, legal texts, and sociopolitical phenomena responding to challenges in epistemologies of knowledge. Inter alia, my studies have used quantitative data, surveys, interviews, archive sources, statistical methods of analysis, historical documents, and qualitative social analysis of law. Largely, my body of research and studies allows a rich, multidimensional, multifaceted and diverse outlook into the mysteries of law, society and politics. This has been and continues to be a dynamic narrative in all my studies and publications from beginning my career as a very young assistant professor through my research before and after becoming a full tenured professor.

As the new Dean of Haifa Law Faculty I intend to continue, strengthen and foster the tradition of excellence in research and teaching for the benefit of University of Haifa and its international reputation as a leading research institution.
